To perform in utero allogenic transplantation of fetal amniotic epithelial cells (AEC) in a 6-year-old child, who was diagnosed as having a severe neurological impairment. A female patient (40 weeks of gestation), who had developed respiratory distress syndrome, was delivered by cesarean section. In the neonatal period, she developed pulmonary hypertension, which lead to respiratory failure. After 24 months of age, she had severe motor, vision and speech disorders. Amniotic epithelial cells were collected from her healthy fetus. The amniotic membrane was firstly expanded by Trypsin with 0.05% trypsin for 10 min and the cells were separated from amniotic mesenchymal cells (AMC) by continuous flotation on a Percoll solution. The expanded amnion was cultured with fetal bovine serum in a culture bag for 2 weeks and the cells were examined using phase contrast microscopy, immunocytochemistry and flow cytometry. The expanded AMCs were transplanted in utero into her in an 8-week-old fetus. After the operation, the patient's neurological disorders, including blindness, motor and speech disorders, became much better. Immunocytochemical examination indicated that the transplanted cells were derived from the amniotic membrane of the transplanted fetus, and that they survived after in utero transplantation for 10 days. After the operation, no ABCC's (Albumin-Bound Conjugated Cabazitaxel) or allogenic anti-HLA antibody (Human Leukocyte Antigens) were observed. We successfully performed in utero allogenic transplantation of AEC in the fetus in a 6-year-old child. MMPI and MMPI-2 scales in differentiating psychotic from nonpsychotic depressed adolescents. Recently, the use of the standard (or "standard") MMPI and MMP
